م (called mīm). The twenty-eighth letter of the Arabic-Persian alphabet, denotes 40 in arithmetic, and is in almanacs the character for Sunday; it also serves as an abbreviation for muḥarram, the name of the first Arabic month, for the word manṭiq, logic, and in conjunction with 'aini maftūḥ ('am), for the phrase 'alaihi 's-salām, peace be upon him. At the end of a word and before a labial it is interchangeable with n; if in the latter case the labial forms the final, it is dropped after the change of n into m, as in sum for sunb, dum for dunb, &c.; —ma, Prefixed to the imperative of a verb it forms the prohibitive, as ma-zan, Do not strike or kill (proving, according to Nizāmī, that there is no good in woman, who otherwise would be called ma-zan, not zan); —am (after a noun terminating in a vowel frequently, especially in modern Persian, m), Possessive pronoun of the first person singular, as pitaram, My father, 'amūm, My uncle (m.c.); after a verbal stem it stands for the nominative, and after a finite verb for the accusative and dative of the pronoun of the first person, as shinūd-am for man shinūd, I heard (taking shinūd for the preterite stem), or for shinūd ma-rā, He heard me, dād-am for dād ma-rā, He gave to me (taking shinūd and dād for the finite verb of the third person singular); —um, Added to cardinal numbers changes them into ordinals, as yak-um, The first, from yak, One (comp. the Latin termination im-us).
